"OOPS" by Ross Barbour

Maybe we mis-named the CD when we called it "Remembering Ken". It is not a memorial service - not a bunch of stories told fondly about Ken Albers. It is a concert we did August 15, 1967 in Ashland, Kentucky.

It is music, applause, Leroy, comedy, and Ken is in there doing his thing on trumpet, mellophone, and bass. He sings the bottom part on most songs, and the second part on a few to help Bill through some voice trouble.

Maybe you have in-person recordings of some of these songs, but do you have "Strangers in the Night" or "Spring Isn't Spring Without You" (Ken and Bill wrote that one)? Bob Flanigan stopped the show with "What Now My Love" (a bass solo "to go down in history").

The original recording ran out before it got all of Bill's "The Gal That Got Away", but we left the start of it in the CD. You'll be glad it is in there - - and I think you'll be glad to have that little silver circle in your collection.

"ROSS' DEFINITIONS"

Chapter: My lips get chapter and chapter

Lunar Cycle: Bicycle for riding on the moon

Inferiority: A sorority for ladies who are afraid

Cofounders: Cult who killed themselves by over rating

Equality: A good deal on the web

Stalemate: (you fill this one in)

Prince of Darkness: Photos taken at night with no flash

Catalyst: The one who looks most like a cow

Indivisible: You can see the 500 mile speedway from there.

Twitter or Not to Twitter

For those of you on Twitter, there's now a page there with news items for fans about the Four Freshmen. You'll find it at <http://twitter.com/FFFanFare>.

And if you're not on Twitter but are interested in seeing what's there, you also can access the site anytime by using the above link.

What you'll find are brief news bites of no more than 140 characters (the Twitter limit per message) and usually a link to a Web page where you can get more information.

Go to the page and you can quickly scan the posts there - most recent first - and decide which links to click for more details. It's pretty simple.
